

The Farm and the City- Helping Each Other Every Day

By: Emily
10-16-08

You wouldn't believe how much the farm and city work together and depend on each other. The farm grows produce. The city provides all of the needed equipment. Both the city and the farm cooperate to make clothing. All of the animals come from the farm and are used in the city. Every day the farm and the city are working together.

Fruits, vegetables, everything else involved in produce are brought to you by the farm. The farm grows and "produces" the produce. The city-made trucks take the produce to the city. There the city contributes by packing and shipping the farm-grown fruits and veggies to the grocery stores. From growing the produce, the farms get money to do it all over again. Next time you buy a bag of broccoli, think of all the hard work put into it.

Get ready for the big one. The equipment. All of the farm's equipment is very important to the farming process. The city makes lots of important things like tractors, plows, and handheld tools. The products that the farm ships out are carried by the city's trucks. By selling the tools to the farm, the city is benefited. The city gets all the money that comes with selling tools. All of the equipment that the city sells to the farm goes into your fruits and veggies.

The animals are a big part of both the farm and the city. If you have ever gone to Charleston, you know that they have ponies pulling carriages everywhere. All of those ponies come from farms! Again, the city helps by manufacturing the equipment to ship the animals, like horse trailers. Do you like a good hamburger or chicken nuggets from Mc Donald's? Well, the farm and city go into those too! The farm raises the animals and the city packs and ships the meat. All the eggs in all the cartons are at the grocery stores because of the farm and the city working together. We have all these great things thanks to the farm and the city working together.

I hope you learned something about how the farm and the city work together. Isn't it amazing how well they cooperate? Every apple and every pony ride at the fair was there thanks to the farm and the city. All of these great things are brought to you by the farm and the city.